Global Community Day U.S.: 'Everyday Heroes' Help Out Across the Northeast & in Bermuda

Editor's Note: On November 17, more than 59,000 Citi volunteers, including family and friends, made a positive difference in their local communities all around the world. Check out the Global Community Day Photo Gallery and see colleagues in EMEA, Japan, Latin America and the Caribbean, Asia Pacific, and the U.S. working together to make the world a better place. Check back often as new photos are being added daily.

In Warren, New Jersey, Chief Operating Office Bob Druskin and 120 employees prepared 250 holiday care packages for U.S. troops serving in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Over the next weeks, we will bring you stories of how Citi's volunteers made Global Community Day 2007 a day to remember.

They collected and distributed tons of food, set up an apartment for a formerly homeless mother and her children, hauled debris—including motorcycles, tires, and bicycles—out of Connecticut's Mill River, and revitalized New York City's Washington Heights Academy. And that's just a sampling of what Citi employees joined by their families and friends did on Global Community Day across the northeast U.S. and in Bermuda.

On a brisk fall morning, 100 volunteers from the Global Consumer Group, Global Wealth Management, Citi Markets & Banking, and the Corporate Center plus families and friends teamed up with students and parents from New York City's Washington Heights Academy, a community-based public school that serves neighborhood children from diverse cultural and socio-economic backgrounds, to give the school's rundown annex an "extreme makeover."

The group teamed with not-for-profit New York Cares and participated in many activities, from
